ENGLAND AS SEEN BY AN AMERICAN BANKER.
Notes of a Pedestrian Tour. 12mo, pp. 345. D. Lothrop & Co.

The American Banker has made a wholly unconventional book, containing a great deal which other travellers have not thought of mentioning, and very little which is not readable. He avoids descriptions of places and "objects of interest," and hardly touches upon his personal adventures. He seems to have talked freely with laborers, artisans, shop-keepers, and other persons outside of what an Englishman would call good society; observed keenly the differences between English and American ways, and sought the explanation of them; gone everywhere in the spirit of intelligent and good-natured curiosity; and so brought home from his tour a fund of information which few strangers could have collected in a stay of several years. It would be too much to say that his budget is of really great value, but it is full of entertainment, and is not without surprises. The Banker is unprejudiced and independent. He is quite willing to admit the superiority of English things whenever his shrewd judgement perceives that they are superior; and he is not at all afraid to dissent from his previous observers when he thinks that they are wrong. The following consecutive entries from his index will give a fair idea of the variety of his topics: "Haddon Hall"; Hay; Hens in a restaurant; Hides; Hone, thoughts of; Horses' tails; Hospital; Saturday; Houseboats; Imbecile as a jester; Individual rights; Inns; There is no arrangement of matter, paragraphs being apparently taken just as they are from the original of the book, and the author has not even been at the pains in all cases of striking out repetitions.

LITERATURE. By HERMAN GRIMM. Translated by Sarah A. Adams. 12mo, pp. xii, 297. Cappell, Updegraff & Co.

The volume which is here presented under a vague and somewhat misleading title is a collection of essays on subjects principally literary, but largely historical. The author is the son of William Grimm, and author of the admirable "Life of Michael Angelo," Emerson, Voltaire, Frederick the Great, Albert Durer, the Brothers Grimm, Bettina von Arnim and Dante are the themes of the essays. The author is fond of broad generalizations and historical survey. Although this method tends to discursiveness it does not lead him into prolixity, and it leaves us upon the whole with a lively comprehension of the drift of his thought, even if the language presented of his subject is not always complete or clear. A sort of German Chauvinism is conspicuous in his reflections, but it is not unpleasant. His style is easy, direct, and unaffected; he is sympathetic, often bright, sometimes witty; and Miss Adus is to be thanked for introducing to us an agreeable, instructive and suggestive companion. The translation is often awkward and ungrammatical, and the book is disfigured by bad spelling and other printer's errors for which the proof-readers ought to be called to account.

AUTHOR OF

THE NEW KING ARTHUR
AND OF

THE BUNTING BALL.

THE OPINION OF WOMEN CRITICS.—

Edna Dean Foster thinks dear Fawcett the author.

The "New King Arthur" is exciting and musical. Its author, as well as that of "The Bunting Ball," I suppose to be Mr. Edger Fawcett.

Harriet Beecher Stowe answers:—

I have been greatly annoyed at the way in which she has treated me in her book.
